- Chapter 1: Does Return Migration Contribute to Economic Development? Evidence from Mexico (Job market paper)

This study estimates the causal effect of return migration on economic development outcomes of municipalities in Mexico. The analysis uses government data covering the period 1999-2015 and a control function approach to exogenize return migration rates with distances to the border and U.S. labor conditions and immigration interior enforcement. It finds that return migration contributes to the prosperity of municipalities, especially through employment and human capital formation.

- Chapter 2: Return Migration and Violence in Mexico (Revised and resubmitted at World Development)

There is reason to suspect that return migrants can reduce the probability of social violence in migrant-prone regions by contributing to social renewal and economic growth. This study looks at Mexico, where violence has wreaked havoc on society in recent years, and finds that return migration significantly reduces the likelihood of homicides across the country.

- Chapter 3: Mixed Effects of Remittances on Child Education (Forthcoming in the IZA Journal of Development and Migration)

This chapter estimates the effect of international remittances on secondary school enrollment in Ecuador. Using the 2010 population census and a bivariate probit model that addresses potential endogeneity, the analysis finds heterogeneous effects on the likelihood of schooling. The strongest positive effects are for poorer, urban males, while the negative effects are for rural females.

RESEARCH IN PROGRESS

1. "The Effects of Migratory Experiences to the United States on Labor Decisions among Return Migrants in Mexico"
This project explores the effect of international migration on individuals' labor decisions upon their return home. It argues that even when returners can invest their resources does not necessarily mean they will. To determine what drives this initiative among Mexican returners, we revisit the role of capital accumulation and evaluate unexplored mechanisms, including social attitudes, risk preferences, and life expectations.
